Most studies of mild cognitive impairment (MCI) in Parkinson's disease (PD) have focused on assessing cognitive impairment as a function of specific dementia syndromes. We determined the impact of dementia severity on the risk of MCI and how the presence of MCI influenced the progression of dementia in 171 patients with PD. Patients with PD were assessed in a cross-sectional design at 2 assessment periods, 1-2 years apart. Of the 171 patients, 147 met diagnostic criteria for PD and were followed over an average of 2.9 +/- 0.4 years. We used standardized clinical examinations and psychiatric interviews to determine dementia severity and the presence of MCI. Symptomatic PD (with or without dementia) was associated with an increased risk of MCI, and the presence of MCI was associated with an increased risk for progression of cognitive decline. Age, severity of motor impairment, and baseline severity of depression or dementia were significantly associated with progression of cognitive decline over time, with the strongest impact of severity of motor impairment.
